

SUCCESSFUL SUPERVISION

Kentuckians under supervision need a fair shot at getting back on their feet. We must reform the state's systems of probation and parole to reduce the skyrocketing number of incarcerated people in already dangerously overcrowded jails and prisons.

THE PROBLEM

More than 50,000 Kentuckians are on probation or parole and are at risk of returning to jail or prison because of simple technical violations.

Violations happen when a probationer or parolee breaks the conditions of their supervision. These violations can be as simple as arriving late to a meeting because of a wreck on the highway.

THE SOLUTION

The ACLU of Kentucky supports legislation reforming Kentucky's community supervision to give formerly incarcerated people a fair chance to successfully reintegrating into their communities.

ALTERNATIVES

Provide alternatives to prison and jails for people who fail to meet all conditions of their release all of the time.

INCENTIVES

Provide incentives to probationers similar to those offered to parolees (i.e. credit for education, volunteering, or participation in a recovery program).

DUE PROCESS

Extend the same due process afforded to Kentuckians accused of a crime to people facing a return to prison or jail for alleged violations.

FAIRER FINES

Implement a fairer system for paying fines and fees to offer people released from jail or prison a better chance to get on their feet.
